Isaac Tucker

UCLA Anderson School of Management

This file contains summary statistics and comments from the Student Experience of Teaching survey conducted automatically after the conclusion of a course. They reference Entrepreneurship and Venture Initiation (Management 160) which was designed and co-taught by myself and Hillary Cookler (also an exceptional job market candidate at UCLA).

The course was rigorously graded. Even after a generous curve, the grade distribution had fewer A grades and more C and D grades than recommended by UCLA. In other words, this was not an easy class and we really pushed students on the materials.

I have not edited or redacted these comments in any way. However, I would like to go on record saying that I did not use AI for my slides, regardless of what that one student says.

Both professors were so organized and broke down every topic into digestible chunks. I have a very different background from the majority of students in that class, and I genuinely felt that I learned something new every single week.
every single slide is AI
Had a lot of real world experience and provided a unique learning experience.
Amazing
– so funny (like in the sense that he has a great sense of humor) – very understanding and genuinely cares for his students I never felt like I was good in business/management but this class made me think that I could do it if I tried. Basically, it gave me confidence in my skills. Thank you! very #grateful for you <3 and only thing that makes me sad about you being a teacher is I can't brag that we both live in Silicon Valley
I also really enjoyed learning from Professor Tucker this quarter. He was Hillary's other half and brought an entrepreneurial background, which again made them a great team. I really enjoyed the way he lectured and how he mixed in stories – I was less likely to space off. Funny guy as well, his facial expressions while Hillary was teaching made me chuckle sometimes. Also, note that both professors were super understanding and communicative. They gave students a lot of chances to be successful, and I believe this was one of their first times teaching a class. They crushed it!
Professor Tucker is extremely passionate about his work and it made the class very enjoyable. He encouraged students to challenge his ideas and really strive to understand what we are all capable of. The set up of the class being very hands on and project based made me understand the content more than test based and it was more fulfilling in the end when we presented our final project.
Strengths: He was an actual entrepreneur and I think that made his lessons interesting and insightful. He gives really good comments. Weaknesses: A little intimidating to ask questions when it is his turn teaching the class.
Professor Tucker was also good.
